Ottoman cuisine was created in the capital of the Roman Empire, Constantinople, where this diverse food was honed in the Imperial Palace's kitchens.

The chefs came from various parts of the Empire to create and experiment with different ingredients. Still today, Ottoman cuisine lives in the Balkans, Anatolia and the Middle East.

Typical of any great cuisine it is based around local varieties, mutual exchange and enrichment, whilst still encompassing a metropolitan tradition of refined taste.

Mezze is simply a selection of small dishes such as meat, poultry, seafood and vegetable appetisers, typically served with beverage. A mezze meal can range from a simple snack to a whole feast. Similar to the Spanish tapas, the Italian antipasti or the French hors d'oeuvres; mezze are part of the relaxed dining culture of the countries along the Mediterranean and Aegean seas.
